Melatonin helps shift workers and travelers find relief from insomnia and resets their internal time clock helping to speed recovery from time shifts and jet lag. It also stimulates the immune system, alleviates depression, helps to offset osteoporosis, PMS and can be used as a form of birth control. Studies have shown melatonin's antioxidant effects and its possible use in treating cancer (especially breast cancer), heart disease and high cholesterol.

Texas Health Science Center in San Antonio showed that Melatonin is more effective in quenching one of the deadliest of all free radicals, the hydroxyl radical. Other studies since, show that melatonin is also a more potent quencher of the proxyl radical than Vitamin C, Vitamin E or glutathione. People looking for weight loss will be happy to hear that Melatonin stimulates the body's production of brown adipose tissue (Bat) that converts calories into heat, thereby increasing metabolism. Athletic performance and training can cause excessive free radicals. Melatonin can not only quench these radicals but also offset the adrenal response intense workouts can generate. Melatonin may be utilized as an effective anti-catabolic, which would help defend hard earned muscle from potential breakdown. Melatonin has some analgesic effects that could theoretically increase the pain-threshold experience in exhaustive-type exercise.
